-from press release

Mayor Gavin Newsom announced the launch of San Francisco's new baseball program that will provide a safe, wholesome experience for inner-city youth. In addition to improving the skill level of individual youth baseball players, the program will include academic tutoring and reinforce the importance of good nutrition and health.

"Bringing kids together through the game of baseball is a great way to foster valuable life skills and enrichment, while encouraging friendships and commitment in a fun atmosphere," said Mayor Newsom. "Playing baseball as a kid gave me confidence to succeed later in life."

Focusing on seven San Francisco neighborhoods, the San Francisco Reviving Baseball in Inner Cities (R.B.I.) Pilot Program's mission is to provide young people with skills to guide them toward success on and off the field. Working in conjunction with the Mayor's Summer Violence Prevention Council, the program teaches baseball skills with an emphasis on education, health, and character development.

"Encouraging healthy relationships between our youth and members of the police department fits in with our over-all goal of safe neighborhoods," said Police Chief Heather Fong. "Participation in sports such as baseball and softball, with the support of corporate sponsors, is one of the ways that leads to partnerships in building safe and healthy communities."
